

A

Under normal conditions, a balance exists between excitatory and inhibitory neurotransmission in the brain.

B

Short-term alcohol exposure tilts the balance toward inhibition by both enhancing the function of inhibitory neurotransmitters and neuromodulators (i.e., GABA, glycine, and adenosine) and decreasing the function of excitatory neurotransmitters (i.e., glutamate and aspartate).

C

Research suggests that after long-term alcohol exposure, the brain attempts to restore equilibrium by compensating for the depressant effects of alcohol; thus, the brain decreases inhibitory neurotransmission and enhances excitatory neurotransmission.

D

During alcohol withdrawal, these compensatory changes are no longer opposed by the presence of alcohol and the balance shifts toward a state of excessive excitation. This state of hyperexcitation is characterized by seizures, delirium, and anxiety.
