THE 'CARPET' PAGES

The most carpet page refers to a full page of non-figurative ornament, often though not exclusively containing a cross form. This type of page is a particular characteristic of Insular Gospel books, usually located between each Evangelist's portrait and the opening words of the Gospel, and serving almost as a decorative or protective fly-leaf, announcing the Gospel to follow. The origins of carpet pages are the subject of some debate. Some have compared them to earlier, however, comparable pages are found as the start or finish of Gospel manuscripts such as the sixth-century Chertsey Gospels,⁴⁰ and the designs of early Celtic bookings also compare well with the layout and design of some of the Insular pages, providing a more likely source.

The six carpet pages of the Book of Durrow demonstrate on the one hand a consistency of design and on the other an eclectic range of motifs. With the exception of the last page (E, viii), each comprises a decorated frame that encloses a design of perfect balance and symmetry, all with the same restricted palette. The range of motifs, however, is a veritable pattern book, drawing inspiration from contemporary art in the Mediterranean, Anglo-Saxon England and Ireland.

CROSS MOTIFS

In later Gospel books of the Insular tradition the central motif of carpet pages is invariably a cross. The (now) opening carpet page (E, vi) of the Book of Durrow is the most explicit in its use, featuring a central, double-armed cross picked out boldly in yellow, against a background of more subtly articulated crosses formed from interlaced strands around a central yellow square. The form of the double-armed cross is unusual, and finds its closest parallel in the Book of Kells where the sole surviving carpet page, which prefaces the Gospel of Matthew xiv, has a cross of similar proportions, however, these the technical and iconographic points of the
