

Drug Prescribing for the Elderly

JOSEPH G. OUSLANDER, MD, Los Angeles

Age-related biologic and physiologic changes, the accumulation of multiple pathologic conditions with increasing age and several socioeconomic considerations combine to make drug prescribing for the elderly one of the most challenging tasks in clinical medicine. Numerous studies in older persons have documented alterations in the pharmacology of many drugs. Several general recommendations are presented which should make drug prescribing for elderly patients safer and more effective.

PRESCRIPTION MEDICATIONS represent a substantial portion of this country's ever-growing health care expenditures. They are not covered by many insurance plans for the elderly, and this can cause considerable out-of-pocket expense from what is often a fixed and limited income.

It is not unusual that several different drugs are prescribed for an elderly patient, to be taken on complex dosage schedules. This is especially so in acute care hospitals, where Medicare patients receive an average of ten prescription drugs,¹ and in nursing homes, where many of the four to seven drugs prescribed for each patient are inappropriate or ineffective.²

Drugs are a major cause of iatrogenic illnesses, conditions which are disturbingly common.³⁻⁵ One recent study found an iatrogenic illness in more than a third of patients on the medical service of a university hospital,⁶ and drugs were one of the most important factors in the development of these complications. Older persons are particularly susceptible to adverse drug reactions; the incidence of adverse reactions in hospitals increases from

3 percent in those aged 10 to 30⁷ to close to 25 percent in those older than age 80.⁸ These reactions contribute to more than 10 percent of admissions to geriatric departments in Great Britain,⁹ and account for as many as 3 percent of all admissions to US hospitals.⁶ As much as $3 billion per year may be spent in this country as a result of adverse drug reactions.⁹

Given these costs, in both health and dollars, physicians should become aware of some of the complex considerations that attend prescribing for the elderly. Age-related biologic and physiologic changes, the accumulation of multiple pathologic conditions with increasing age and several socioeconomic factors combine to make prescribing drugs one of the most difficult, yet challenging, aspects of caring for these patients.

This article will briefly review age-related changes that are relevant to drug prescribing, and make several recommendations which are designed to make treatment of the elderly with drugs safer and more effective.

Age-Related Changes Relevant to Drug Prescribing

Altered Reporting and Presentation of Illness

Altered reporting and presentation of illness can make accurate diagnosis, and therefore appropriate drug prescription, more difficult in
