The railway network at its zenith

At the turn of the twentieth century the rail network extended to cover 23,000 miles, very nearly the circumference of the world. This was the greatest length it was ever to achieve for already some urban centres had closed and later hundreds of rural lines and stations succumbed to the Bouching loss. This map shows the network in its heyday before the decline commenced.

Bradshaw's Railway Map 1907, 2006-12-15 A detailed map of the railway network at its zenith At the turn of the twentieth century the rail network in Britain and Ireland extended to over 23 000 miles very nearly the circumference of the world This was the greatest length it was ever to achieve for already some urban routes had lost the fight with electric trams and later culminating in the Beeching axe hundreds of rural lines and stations were closed This map shows the network in its heyday before the decline commenced This map shows lines in England Scotland Wales and Ireland with detailed enlargements of the major conurbations The great main lines with major stations and termini are marked as well as many small village halts on the humble country branch lines The map bears witness to the culmination of the gargantuan engineering feat which produced 23 000 route miles in the 82 years since the first 25 miles of railway was completed between Stockton and Darlington in 1825 Compare that to the less than 11 000 miles we have a century later and use the map to explore the hundreds of routes with their stations which ran through so many parts of the country but survived for no more than a few generations before succumbing to the march of progress which favoured alternative means of transport Rolled with a coloured mount ready for framing

Living within a Fair Share Ecological Footprint Robert Vale, Brenda Vale, 2013-09-02 According to many authorities the impact of humanity on the earth is already overshooting the earth's capacity to supply humanity's needs This is an unsustainable position This book does not focus on the problem but on the solution by showing what it is like to live within a fair earth share ecological footprint The authors describe numerical methods used to calculate this concentrating on low or no cost behaviour change rather than on potentially expensive technological innovation They show what people need to do now in regions where their current lifestyle means they are living beyond their ecological means such as in Europe North America and Australasia The calculations focus on outcomes rather than on detailed discussion of the methods used The main objective is to show that living with a reduced ecological footprint is both possible and not so very different from the way most people currently live in the west The book clearly demonstrates that change in behaviour now will avoid some very challenging problems in the future The emphasis is on workable practical and sustainable solutions based on quantified research rather than on generalities about overall problems facing humanity
