Abstract

This study introduces and illustrates the potential of an integrated multi-omics approach in investigating the underlying biology of complex traits such as childhood aggressive behavior. In 645 twins (cases = 42%), we trained single- and integrative multi-omics models to identify biomarkers for subclinical aggression and investigated the connections among these biomarkers. Our data comprised transmitted and two non-transmitted polygenic scores (PGSs) for 15 traits, 78,772 CpGs, and 90 metabolites. The single-omics models selected 31 PGSs, 1614 CpGs, and 90 metabolites, and the multi-omics model comprised 44 PGSs, 746 CpGs, and 90 metabolites. The predictive accuracy for these models in the test ($N = 277$, cases = 42%) and independent clinical data ($N = 142$, cases = 45%) ranged from 43 to 57%. We observed strong connections between DNA methylation, amino acids, and parental non-transmitted PGSs for ADHD, Autism Spectrum Disorder, intelligence, smoking initiation, and self-reported health. Aggression-related omics traits link to known and novel risk factors, including inflammation, carcinogens, and smoking.

Introduction

Omics studies can lead to an improved understanding of the biological mechanisms contributing to mental health and disorders (Jakovljevic and Jakovljevic 2019). Different omics technologies, e.g., genomics, epigenomics, transcriptomics, or metabolomics, assess different aspects of the development and progression of complex traits and disorders. The analysis of a single omics layer provides a unique, but likely incomplete, picture of the underlying biology, whereas studies combining multiple omics layers may lead to more comprehensive insights into human biology.
