

Tool #10: Working in Teams

Every change effort should be pursued through a collaborative team process.^{viii}

Thomas Harvey

Because we are adults, it is assumed that we understand what is meant by the word "team," and that we understand the principles that underlie effective teaming. Because of this false assumption, teams are frequently unable to analyze their processes and intervene with strategies that promote team health. Rather, they tend to believe that if certain team members resign (or are removed), the team will be operational.

This tool is designed to explain the characteristics of an effective team and suggest ways to use those characteristics to continually assess and address team health.

Team versus Group

When an identifiable group of people are working together face-to-face toward a common goal and are interdependent upon each other to realize that goal, they may be referred to as a team. If any of these factors are missing, they may simply be a group of individuals that come together with their own agenda and no common purpose.

Team Size

Six to twelve members is the ideal team size. Fewer than six may not provide enough variety of ideas and more than twelve tend to split into subgroups that are likely to undermine the concept of teaming.

Team Members

While most school teams are selected to represent constituencies (academics, career/technical, parents, community, and students) schools may want to select team members who represent key decision-making categories, if creating change is the goal. One person may represent more than one category and more than one person may represent each category. Voluntary participation is the most productive. Members typically fall into one or more of the following categories:

- Decision Maker – Senior staff, administrator, and/or district representative;
- Stakeholder – Staff/student who will be required to carry out the change or be directly affected by the change;
- Expert – Someone who has knowledge about the issues and/or the change process;
- Supporter – Someone committed to seeing that the change occurs;
- Resister – Someone who likes the status quo and is dubious about the proposed change; and,
- Facilitator – A task-oriented individual with good people skills who has no vested interest in the change but is interested in making the process work.
