

Macroeconomic Research and Policy Making: Processes and Agenda

Nadeem Ul Haque

It is indeed an honor to present the Mahbubul Haq Memorial lecture this year at the PSDE. Dr. Haq was the single most important economist that Pakistan has produced. He laid the groundwork for the development planning as well as affected many a policy debate in the international circles the most memorable of which is his human development Index. He is the only economist whose ideas influenced country policy and who engaged in international development discourse.

We should all feel his loss enormously. Maybe he could have led us public policy people into a profession and a community. Maybe he could have developed domestic debates and thinking. Maybe the donors would have engaged with him and allowed him to influence the domestic policy and research agenda. Yet I fear he too might have failed to form a research community where funding incentivizes individual rent seeking over debate, conversation and agenda-setting (see Haque and Khan (1998 and 2017). I do recall that the Pakistani economists in the World Bank could not come together to memorialize him upon his death.

Epistemology of Policy

The PSDE is an evolving forum for economists, development and public policy professionals to share knowledge of their respective fields while also developing analysis and policy ideas for Pakistan. It is worth our while to keep review policymaking and the policy process at this august forum. The community and its key thinkers must reflect on the role of research and the research community on policy.

My contention is that since Mahubul Haq's time the economist community and our research has been totally ineffective in informing policy or even generating a meaningful debate on any policy issues. I know this is an offensive statement and many might contend it. But like all such statements it is meant to be broad generalization covering the large mass of research. I will concede the possibility of some tail events where there could be an impact but my hypothesis is that they will be rare.

While the number of economists has increased and forums like PSDE, SDPI, the LSE conference are available and the number of universities have increased from 4 to 180, sadly influential academics and public intellectuals in the public policy field are rare.² Why is it that we are

² The vacuum has been filled by a lengthy and almost empty conversation on foreign policy and security. Surprisingly considerable donor funding has gone to developing a large supply of foreign policy and security analysts.
