Disorders TMD most specialists favour a multidisciplinary approach and treatment of socio psycho emotional factors as well as dental lingual or postural disorders Yet little is known from a clinical point of view about a tricky oral spastic habit called severe teeth clenching In view of the lack of clinical findings from classical investigations on the subject it could be considered as the hidden part of an oral parafunctional iceberg Neuroscience has been able to shed some light on the multiple connections between trigeminal and non trigeminal nervous centres which confirms the significant involvement of the stomatognathic system and trigeminal nerves V in both oral as well as non oral major functions such as eating breathing speaking hearing and standing and also confirms the extensive participation of the paired Vs in the human adaptation process Too many physicians are still reluctant to admit the pathological responsibilities of the Vs Therefore their role remains largely underestimated by clinicians Stress conditions in introverted people cause a parafunctional habit i e severe clenching which in turn produces trigeminal overstimulation and nociception Through a process of sensitization this can perturb some non trigeminal nervous areas such as the vestibular nuclei and cerebellum involved in equilibrium Would you then be willing to accept the possibility that a stressed and introverted patient who clenches hard durably or frequently may end up suffering from dizziness If not this book is not for you But if you accept the scientific data and clinical facts this book will offer a concrete therapeutic protocol the Relaxing and Moderating Treatment RMT which can greatly help you to familiarize yourself with and neutralize this little known deleterious spastic oral parafunction and its many disconcerting pain causing and dysfunctional clinical effects Prepare to be amazed by the results just as we were
