Introduction: Clinical staging aims to refine psychiatric diagnosis by describing mental disorders on a continuum of disorder progression, with the pragmatic goal of improved treatment planning and outcome prediction. The first systematic review on this topic, published a decade ago, included 78 papers, and identified separate staging models for schizophrenia, unipolar depression, bipolar disorder, panic disorder, substance use disorder, anorexia, and bulimia nervosa. The current review updates this review by including new proposals for staging models and by systematically reviewing research based upon full or partial staging models since 2012.

Methods: PsycINFO, MEDLINE, EMBASE, and the Cochrane databases were systematically searched from 2012 to June 2023. The original review's eligibility criteria were used and extended with newly introduced categories of DSM-5 mental disorders, along with mental disorders for which a progressive course might be expected. Included papers: a) contained a complete or partial staging model, or b) focused upon clinical features that might be associated with stages, or c) focused upon treatment research associated with specific stages.

Results: Seventy-one publications met the inclusion criteria. They described staging models for schizophrenia and related psychoses (21 papers), bipolar (20), depressive (4), anxiety (2), obsessive-compulsive (3), trauma-related (4), eating (3), personality disorders (2), and "transdiagnostic" staging models (13).

Natural Resistance to and Host-Directed

Prevention of Tuberculosis Robert Wilkinson, Anna Kathleen Coussens, Thomas Richard Hawn, 2020-06-16 Tuberculosis remains an important bacterial disease responsible for more than one million deaths per year The risk of overt disease is highest in the first year post infection nevertheless asymptomatic chronic infection referred to as Latent Tuberculosis Infection LTBI may also be established LTBI cannot be ascertained directly it can only be inferred from a skin or blood test of immune sensitization Nevertheless it is often stated that one third of the world's population has LTBI The central tenet of Tuberculosis control has therefore been antibiotic treatment of overt disease and the selective less intensive antibiotic treatment of patients considered at risk of progression of LTBI Much Tuberculosis research has been directed towards elucidation of the mechanisms of host susceptibility to disease The best characterized immune risk factor for Tuberculosis is HIV 1 co infection Others include anti TNF therapies Diabetes Mellitus other forms of immunosuppression and cigarette smoking However in most clinical cases of Tuberculosis no underlying immunological defect can be identified Since the general assumption is that most people infected with Tuberculosis never develop disease this suggests that most people who are exposed and infected with Mycobacterium tuberculosis harbor immunity to Tuberculosis This encourages the hypothesis that vaccination should be possible and indeed Bacille Calmette Guérin BCG vaccination confers protection against disseminated disease in children However BCG vaccination is not associated with reduced pulmonary disease in adults which is a significant limitation Furthermore it has been recognized that increased resistance to Tuberculosis occurs in specific populations These include i heavily exposed persons in whom tests of immune sensitization nevertheless remain persistently negative ii children aged between 5 years and puberty and iii persons with documented persistent positive tests of sensitization who nevertheless never manifest disease As progress towards the elimination of Tuberculosis is insufficient under current antibiotic based strategies the idea to enhance immune resistance either via improved vaccination or enhanced natural immunity is important Recent research interest has therefore increased attention on the analysis of resistance in humans The current BCG vaccine is conventionally thought to prevent progression of established infection However vaccination strategies now also envisage the prevention of infection and relapse There has been a rapid growth of interest in adjunctive host directed immune interventions which aim to either enhance protective immunity or to regulate pathological tissue damaging immunity However the idea of host directed prevention is less widely discussed

Functional Genomics and Proteomics in the Clinical Neurosciences Scott E. Hemby, Sabine Bahn, 2006-10-09 The purpose of this work is to familiarize neuroscientists with the available tools for proteome research and their relative abilities and limitations To know the identities of the thousands of different proteins in a cell and the modifications to these proteins along with how the amounts of both of these change in different conditions would revolutionize biology and medicine While important strides are being made towards achieving the goal of global mRNA analysis mRNA is not the functional endpoint of gene expression and mRNA expression may not directly equate with protein expression There are many potential applications for proteomics in neuroscience determination of the neuro proteome comparative protein expression profiling post translational protein modification profiling and mapping protein protein interactions to name but a few Functional Genomics and Proteomics in Clinical Neuroscience will comment on all of these applications but with an emphasis on protein expression profiling This book combines the basic methodology of genomics and proteomics with the current applications of such technologies in understanding psychiatric illnesses Introduction of basic methodologies in genomics and proteomics and their integration in psychiatry Development of the text in sections related to methods application and future directions of these rapidly advancing technologies Use of actual data to illustrate many principles of functional genomics and proteomics Introduction to bioinformatics and database management techniques
