De L'Orme George Payne Rainsford James, 2020-09-28 I was born in the heart of Bearn in the year 1619 and if the scenery amongst which we first open our eyes and from which we receive our earliest impressions could communicate its own peculiar character to our minds I should certainly have possessed a thousand great and noble qualities that might have taught me to play a very different part from that which I have done in the great tragic farce of human life Nevertheless in contemplating the strange contrasts of scenery the gay the sparkling the grand the gloomy the sublime wherein my infant years were passed I have often thought I saw a sort of picture of my own fate with its abrupt and rapid changes and even in some degree of my own character or rather of my own mood varying continually through all the different shades of disposition from the lightest mirth to the most profound gloom from the idlest heedlessness to the most anxious thought However it is not my own peculiar character that I sit down to depict that will be sufficiently displayed in the detail of my adventures but it is rather those strange and singular events which contrary to all probability mingled me with great men and with great actions and which continually counteracting my own will impelled me ever on the very opposite course from that which I straggled to pursue For many reasons it is necessary to commence this narrative with those early years wherein the mind of man receives its first bias when the seeds of all future actions are sown in the heart and when causes in themselves so trifling as almost to be imperceptible chain us to good or evil to fortune or misfortune for ever The character of man is like a piece of potter s clay which when fresh and new is easily fashioned according to the will of those into whose hands it falls but its form once given and hardened either by the slow drying of time or by its passage through the ardent furnace of the world men may break it to atoms but never bend it again to another mould
