

HOW TO IDENTIFY DUCK DECOYS

UNDERSTAND THE HISTORY OF A COLLECTOR'S GUIDE

1. IDENTIFY THE DECOY
The first step in identifying a duck decoy is to determine its type. There are three main types of duck decoys: the "head and neck" type, the "full body" type, and the "tail" type. Each type has its own unique characteristics and history.

2. CHECK FOR MAKE MARKS
Once you have identified the type of decoy, the next step is to check for make marks. These are small, often carved, marks that identify the maker or the workshop. They can be found in various locations, such as the head, neck, or tail.

3. CHECK FOR SIGNATURES
The final step is to check for signatures. These are larger, more prominent marks that often include the name of the maker. They can be found on the head, neck, or tail, and are often carved in a stylized font.

Check for make marks and signatures

Duck decoys are a popular and valuable part of the collector's world. They are often made of wood and are highly detailed, showing the feathers and features of the birds. The history of duck decoys is long and fascinating, with many different types and styles being developed over the years.

One of the most important things to remember when collecting duck decoys is to always check for make marks and signatures. These marks can help you identify the maker and the workshop, and they can also be a valuable clue to the age and value of the decoy.

There are many different types of duck decoys, each with its own unique characteristics. Some are made of wood, while others are made of other materials like plastic or metal. The most common type is the "head and neck" type, which is often used for hunting. Other types include the "full body" type, which is often used for display, and the "tail" type, which is often used for fishing.

The history of duck decoys is long and fascinating, with many different types and styles being developed over the years. It is a hobby that is both challenging and rewarding, and it is one that is sure to continue to grow in popularity for many years to come.
