3.0 AIMS AND OBJECTIVES

You will have grasped, by the end of this Unit, the significance of climax building in creative writing.

The purpose of this Unit is to show how:

- important the building of a climax is in the structure of a story;
- the story moves towards its climax which may be unexpected but is not improbable;
- the climax resolves the crisis in the story and reveals, as nothing else in the story does, the writer's perception of a particular reality;
- a postscript to the climax, in certain writings, profoundly affects the direction of the story and opens up newer perspectives.

It is hoped that you will also have learnt the technique of building a climax while writing a story.

3.1 INTRODUCTION

Units 1 and 2 of this Block on the 'structure of material' have already given you an idea of how themes are generated and of the significance of the 'opening'. In this Unit we will discuss, in some detail, an important constituent of a plot: the climax in a story or a poem.

A well-structured climax is a revelation of the writer's world-view. However, if you think that there can be no story without a climax, read some modern writers—e.g. Borges, Faulkner, Prem Chand. Events and incidents are recorded. It is only in the postscript that the intention of the writer dawns upon the reader—and he may feel like rereading the fictional work.

3.2 THE MEANING OF CLIMAX: AN ILLUSTRATIVE STORY

Climax is an intense and crucial point of the story which precipitates a crisis. A crisis is the culmination of tension and conflict which heads towards an inevitable resolution. The story given below will illustrate to you the art of building a climax, its nature and function.
