Construal Lyn Frazier, Charles Clifton, 1996 Construal presents a new theory of sentence processing one that allows a limited type of underspecification in the syntactic analysis of sentences It extends what has arguably been the dominant theory of parsing the garden path theory developed by Lyn Frazier and colleagues through the 1980s into new and previously unexplored domains and greatly advances the potential for insights into how meaning is both made and understood Frazier and Clifton both pioneers in parsing theory present new psycholinguistic theory and experimentation concerning how nonprimary phrases are analyzed in sentence comprehension They define a process of construal and show how it accounts for cases in which the parser does not fully determine structure during the course of ordinary comprehension The idea of construal arises in part through the authors critical review of the challenges to their established framework for research on structural parsing While they demonstrate that the principles of parsing theory remain valid for a wide variety of languages and grammatical constructions they go beyond them to clearly identify those types of constructions built by the process of construal Frazier and Clifton show that construal follows distinct principles and they flesh out their hypothesis with previously unexamined evidence and new empirical tests
