

China's Foreign Policy in the 1980s From Anti-Hegemony to Modernization Diplomacy

Joseph Y. S. Cheng

*Dept. of Government and Public Administration,
The Chinese University,
Hong Kong*

MAJOR CHANGES have taken place in China's domestic politics and foreign policy since the fall of the Gang of Four in 1976. Under the present pragmatic leadership, China appears to have been relying more and more on the West for capital and advanced technology to speed up its economic growth. On 12 August 1978, the Chinese government concluded a peace and friendship treaty with the Fukuda government of Japan which included an anti-hegemony clause. On 16 December of the same year China and the United States established formal diplomatic relations, and in their joint communique, both sides reaffirmed the principle of anti-hegemony. In view of such developments many observers then believed that in soliciting the support of the West in checking Soviet global expansion, China had entered into some kind of an alliance, with the United States and Japan.

In the early 1980s, however, problems emerged in Sino-American relations and progress stagnated. The Taiwan question as well as limitations on textile exports from China and high technology exports from the United States, etc. caused much friction. On the other hand, Sino-Soviet relations showed signs of improvement. Leonid Brezhnev took the initiative which resulted in talks on the normalization of the bilateral relationship at the deputy foreign minister's level, the first round of which was held in October 1982 in Beijing. Has China's foreign policy undergone significant changes?
