Building a Campuswide Culture of Assessment: Including Nonacademic Departments in the Process

Janice A. Gruckin

BUILDING A CAMPUSWIDE CULTURE OF ASSESSMENT IS A COMPLEX, LONG-TERM goal, and the process for achieving such a lofty goal must be thoughtfully planned, persistently and creatively implemented, and, above all, inclusive of the various campus constituencies that form the backbone of our academic community. Often, as campus assessment initiatives proceed, nonacademic departments and programs may be included only to support roles for academic departments or, worse, relegated to the observers' gallery with no active role whatsoever. This article describes the establishment of one collaboration, the Student Study Habits Project, which brought a nonacademic department—the Division of Campus Residence—into an active participatory role in providing the culture of assessment on the campus of a midsize, suburban public research university (Owens, 2000).

The Student Study Habits Project

The Student Study Habits Project grew out of a chance meeting with the academic staff and a casual conversation between the director of the Division of Campus Residence and me. We discussed the division's plan to open housing centers (in residence halls) and I observed that often such initiatives are undertaken with an awareness of their potential for success. Our long-standing and mutually respectful professional relationship—our social capital—provided the medium for a decision that we would initiate a study to assess the potential for success of the residence-hall-based learning centers. Thus, the Student Study Habits Project was born. The project would also allow us to collect data to determine the strength of previous findings regarding validity and reliability of a process for early identification of students potentially at academic risk.
