Birds In Jeopardy The Imperiled And Extinct Birds Of The United States And Canada:

Birds in Jeopardy Paul R. Ehrlich, David S. Dobkin, Darryl Wheye, 1992-03-01 As the human population skyrockets and the toxic impact of human society spreads the natural habitats of birds degrade and diminish and the bird populations decline Two hundred years ago when the United States and Canada were home to less than 5 million people they were also home to some 650 species of birds Today more than 280 million people live there and 33 bird species have already been driven to extinction and well over 150 are in danger of extinction in all Or parts of their range This book organized and written by the authors of The Birder s Handbook and enriched by 191 strikingly beautiful color paintings illustrating all of the birds treated is the first concise authoritative review of the status of the birds currently imperiled in the United States and Canada those that are federally listed as Endangered or Threatened and those that are listed by the National Audubon Society as suffering local or regional or Widespread decline It also treats the birds that have been driven to extinction in the past two centuries since the stories of their somber fates can help us learn how to save the other birds that are in jeopardy Because birdwatchers and others are showing increased interest in the tropical birds that survive in Hawaii and Puerto Rico the book includes separate sections on the imperiled and extinct birds of those areas Hawaii is of special importance because it has Seen so many extinctions just in the years since Cook s arrival 23 species and subspecies it provides a laboratory for studying the impact of civilization on birds in the wild The individual texts written in clear non technical language cover requirements for successful nesting and feeding worldwide and North American breeding range wintering range and imperiled portions of range current population estimates for Threatened and Endangered birds behavioral And other factors pertinent to conservation former and or current threats associated with decline current status of imperilment federally funded recovery plans and the date of last sighting in those desperate cases where extinction is imminent or already a fact In the last century coal miners took canaries into the mines reasoning that if poisonous gases were present the birds would give warning by succumbing first Now birds are serving as miners canaries once Again In the language of ecology they are good indicator species warning us that too many people unbridled consumption of wildlands and other natural resources faulty technologies and irresponsible disposal of chemical and other wastes threaten not just birds but ourselves and every other living thing In our daily lives we seldom see the terrible effects of these forces but they are demonstrated every day by scientific surveys of the environment around the world
