

Abstract

Meta-assessment, or the assessment of the outcomes assessment process, is a useful strategy to communicate, guide, document, and provide feedback on assessment practices. We share the creation of a rubric that aligns with assessment processes aimed to improve student learning and development in higher education. More specifically, the rubric was created to align with the student affairs professional standards and explicitly evaluates equity-related aspects of each component of the outcomes assessment process. Additionally, we highlight the rubric as a necessary step in a broader change management effort. We then share procedures of the initial use of the rubric to evaluate assessment reports. After analyzing rubric scores (i.e., G-study) and qualitative feedback from several raters, we then describe additional support resources intentionally created to facilitate more reliable ratings. We freely share the rubric, training reports, and support materials to enable a culture of improvement in higher education institutions.

A Meta-Assessment Rubric to Guide Professional Development and Practice in Equitable Outcomes Assessment

The outcomes assessment process facilitates the evaluation of higher education programming to meet intended student learning and development outcomes. The information gathered via the assessment process can uncover needed changes to programming to better achieve intended outcomes. However, the usefulness of assessment data to guide program improvement depends on its quality and the process to gather outcomes assessment data.

What is Meta-Assessment and its Utility?

Meta-assessment is the evaluation of the quality of the assessment process (e.g., Fulcher & Good, 2013). Stemming from the evaluation literature (Ory, 1992), the practice of meta-assessment developed to meet the increased engagement in outcomes assessment in higher education. That is, guidelines and standards associated with outcomes assessment needed to be developed to guide high-quality processes and data. Meta-assessment served this need for both summative (for accountability) and formative (for improvement) purposes (McDonald, 2010).

To structure a meta-assessment process, a rubric or checklist is typically developed that specifies characteristics of high-quality assessment practice. Ratings from the rubric or checklist can serve as evidence of engagement in the assessment process for accreditation
