

1) Greek-American organizations, stepping stones for Greek immigrants

The American Dream was an ideal for many foreigners at that time, and the Greek population was part of them. But as many other migrants, when they arrived in the New World, they were not welcomed with open arms. As had happened with the Irish settlers in the 19th century for instance (with the famous signs in front of shops reading “No Dogs, No Irish”), Greek immigrants were also rejected. At the time of rapid industrialization in America, Greek communities did not manage to follow up the pace, and failed at every organization they tried to set up, adding to the dislike of the first settlers: “the people of America [...] had an antipathy for dark, uneducated foreigners. Greeks were boycotted and persecuted, called “Dirty Greeks,” and run out of small towns.”¹ This led them to build strong communities in big cities like NY, where they tried to start afresh.

1) The AHEPA, help to assimilation

This bigotry brought about the birth of the AHEPA, the American Hellenic Educational Progressive Association. It was founded on July 26, 1922 by eight naturalized Greeks. It is the “oldest American-based, Greek heritage grassroots membership organization”².

As is said in the Saloniki-Greek Press:

This organization adopted Americanism and fought to break down and conquer the prejudice that so hindered the progress of the Greeks in America. It strive to clear the path for the successful progress of the Hellenism of this land. The Ahepa became a living symbol, both to the Greeks and the Americans. As time passed it became apparent that the objectives of the Ahepa were being realized. The last stubborn resistance was overcome by the honesty, kindness, and sincerity of the Greeks. The American people began to regard the owner of the Greek restaurant in his neighborhood and his Greek fruit peddler as respected friends. The Greeks won a place for themselves among the Americans, and their biggest aid toward this end was the American Hellenic Educational Progressive Association. Released from their bonds, the Greeks of America took courage and faced the future with hope and determination to succeed³.

Therefore the AHEPA managed to favor the integration of Greeks into the American system, principle at the basis of the organization's Constitution, which set “to emphasize loyalty to the United-States; to develop appreciation of citizenship under the state and federal governments; to promote clean politics by upholding the ideal in civic and social matters”; “to uphold the public school system of the United States”⁴.

Therefore this association is truly, since its founding, a transitional place where Greek-Americans went to
