

Tier 2 response to intervention in secondary mathematics education

Emily C. Bouck and Missy D. Cosby

Michigan State University, East Lansing, MI, USA

ABSTRACT

Response to intervention (RtI) is increasingly being used in elementary and secondary schools both to provide early intervention and support to struggling students and to identify students who may benefit from special education. Although research exists to guide and support the implementation of RtI in elementary schools, much less information exists for the implementation in secondary schools, and especially in mathematics. This article discusses RtI in elementary and secondary education, with particular attention to mathematics and Tier 2 services within RtI at the secondary level. The authors provide options and alternatives for the delivery of Tier 2 mathematics services in secondary schools.

Case study

Ms. Smith is a middle school mathematics teacher. Her administrator just recently informed her that she was going to be part of the Math RtI team for her school. Specifically, Ms. Smith's administrator indicated that she wanted Ms. Smith to be instrumental in helping the school plan and implement Tier 2 intervention services for the students who were deemed to not be making satisfactory progress in the general education mathematics classes and were identified as struggling on a universal screening assessment. Ms. Smith is aware of what RtI is and, even to some extent, what it looks like in her school district's elementary school. However, Ms. Smith has not seen models of RtI for secondary schools in general, let alone for mathematics. Ms. Smith realizes she needs to know a lot more about RtI at the secondary level in mathematics, including instruction in the different tiers.

Mr. Jones is a high school mathematics teacher in a similar situation as Ms. Smith. He has also been asked by his administrator to work with a team on implementing RtI at his high school. Like Ms. Smith, Mr. Jones is aware of RtI but has little knowledge of how it might be implemented in a high school. Mr. Jones is concerned about the when, where, and who of RtI, especially Tier 2 services. Also, Mr. Jones knows he needs to learn much more about RtI in mathematics, RtI in secondary schools, and RtI in general.

RtI as a multitiered system of support

Response to intervention (RtI) is a multitiered system of support, meaning it is a system for problem-solving to determine students' needs and provide instruction and services to meet those needs on a tiered (i.e., different levels) approach (Cusumano, Algozzine, & Algozzine, 2014). Multitiered systems of support (MTSS) integrate assessment, instruction, and intervention to address the needs of all learners with regard to academics and behavior. As stated, RtI is an MTSS framework; Positive Behavior Intervention and Supports (PBIS) is another MTSS framework (Lane, Carter, Jenkins, Dwiggins, & Germer, 2015).

In the Individuals with Disabilities Education Improvement Act (2004), RtI was stated as an alternative means of identifying students with learning disabilities. Before RtI, students with learning disabilities were identified through the IQ–achievement discrepancy model, meaning a student was identified as having a learning disability if there was a severe discrepancy between his or her achievement as measured on standardized assessments and his or her intelligence as measured by an IQ test (Vaughn & Fuchs, 2003). The IQ–achievement discrepancy model was critiqued as a “wait to fail” model, primarily because schools wait until students have demonstrated a significant enough discrepancy between achievement and IQ score before support and services are provided.
