Abstract: (1) Background: It is simpler and more environmentally friendly to use supercritical CO₂ fluid technology to process skincare viscose fabrics. Therefore, it is significant to study the release properties of drug-loaded viscose fabrics to choose suitable skincare drugs. In this work, the release kinetics model fittings were investigated in order to clarify the release mechanism and provide a theoretical basis for processing skincare viscose fabrics with supercritical CO₂ fluid. (2) Methods: Nine kinds of drugs with different substituent groups, different molecular weights, and different substitution positions were loaded onto viscose fabrics using supercritical CO₂ fluid. Then, the drug-loaded viscose fabrics were placed in an ethanol medium, and the release curves were drawn. Finally, the release kinetics were fitted using zero-order release kinetics, the first-order kinetics model, the Higuchi model, and the Korsmeyer–Peppas model. (3) Results: The Korsmeyer–Peppas model was the best-fitting model for all the drugs. Drugs with different substituent groups were released via a non-Fickian diffusion mechanism. On the contrary, other drugs were released via a Fickian diffusion mechanism. (4) Conclusions: In view of the release kinetics, it was found that the viscose fabric can swell when a drug with a higher solubility parameter is loaded onto it using supercritical CO₂ fluid, and the release rate is also slower.

Keywords: release kinetics model; drug-loaded viscose fabric; supercritical CO₂ fluid; Fickian diffusion

1. Introduction

Viscose fiber is the main variety of regenerated fiber, and its raw material comes from natural cellulose with the largest reserves and the most sustainable development on Earth [1]. Viscose fiber has been widely used in underwear products because of its moisture absorption, air permeability, antistatic, good color fastness, and spinning properties. However, with the development of society, people have a tendency to choose functional fabrics, such as antimicrobial [2], personal cooling [3], or waterproof [4] ones. Therefore, if viscose fabric is endowed with skincare functionality such as antioxidant, skin whitening, moisturizing, etc., its additional value and consumer market will improve significantly in the field of underwear.

Some methods have been utilized to fabricate skincare textiles including blended spinning technology [5] and microencapsulation [6]. A large quantity of drugs (2–10 wt%) can be mixed into the fiber through blended spinning, but it is not suitable for thermosensitive drugs [7]. In addition, it leads to wastage of the drug because most of the drug is distributed in the interior of the fiber and cannot be released, and the properties of the fiber can be affected by the drugs. Microencapsulation can not only protect drugs from the environmental impact but also slow down the release rate of drugs such as vitamins [8] and essential oils [9]. However, the preparation process is complex and requires the usage of organic solvents [10,11]. When the microcapsule is loaded on the fabric, it can easily affect the touch feeling because of the joint of the cross-linking agent.

By contrast, supercritical CO₂ fluid technology is a simpler, green, and efficient finishing technology that can dissolve or carry drugs into the surface and interior of the fabric,
