

HEALTH CONSEQUENCES OF THE EXPERIENCE OF MIGRATION

Stanislav V. Kasl and Lisa Berkman

Department of Epidemiology and Public Health, Yale University School of Medicine, New Haven, Connecticut 06510

Introduction

It is our aim to examine and evaluate the evidence regarding the effects of the psychosocial experience of migration on health status. We intend to focus on (a) migrations that involve the crossing of national boundaries or substantial changes in socio-cultural environments; (b) physical health status and biological indicators, rather than mental health, attitudes, and behaviors; (c) issues of evidence, and interpreting such evidence, rather than issues of theory and conceptualization.

It is impossible, however, to adhere rigidly to this intended focus, and the boundaries of this review thus cannot be precisely defined. For example, studies that deal with rural to urban transitions within the same country may offer useful evidence on the effects of urbanization and industrialization, which are so often an important part of the overall phenomenon of international migration. Or, comparisons of health status of off-spring of migrants with that of native born may tell us something important about cultural conflict even though no residential mobility is involved. It would be similarly imprudent to ignore all studies dealing with psychological or behavioral reactions. Frequently, such data can provide crucial information about intervening processes and mediating variables, without which the evidence regarding distal outcomes, physical health status changes, may be difficult to interpret. Finally, a complete disregard for the theoretical analyses of the migration phenomenon would lead us to uninformed interpretations of results; furthermore, we would not be able to judge if important variables were included in a particular study and if the included variables adequately represented the underlying concepts or processes.

We organize this chapter around several topics:

1. The logic of health studies of migrants and methodological limitations that compromise findings and their interpretation.
