

support might be effective in increasing detection and appropriate treatment of female patients with depression and other psychiatric morbidity.

This study has several limitations. The sample of practitioners was small and heterogeneous and therefore may or may not accurately reflect the views, attitudes, and opinions of primary care providers throughout the MOH system. It is also possible that the focus group setting inhibited some participants from expressing their views. There was, however, remarkable agreement among all the focus groups; the themes reported were common to all focus groups. This study is intended to generate theories and hypotheses about the barriers to diagnosis and treatment of depression in the primary care setting of MOH clinics in Jordan. It is unclear whether these themes accurately reflect barriers in other medical settings. Future studies are needed to further define these barriers.

Finally, there exists a critical need for further studies of depression in the Arab cultural context. Future studies focusing on cultural concepts of mental illness, the development of reconceptualizing approaches to depressed patients and their families in primary care, identification of factors that are protective against mental illness, and the continued development of locally validated, clinically useful screening instruments in Arabic would be important steps in the development of a regional research agenda.
