Abstract

This paper investigates the characteristics of functionally derelict areas in Slovenia, criteria for their identification, typology and arguments for further monitoring, and regular updating of this new spatial and data layer. Both specifying the precise location and knowledge of characteristics of derelict areas, i.e. brownfields, are an important step towards sustainable planning and placement of activities. In 2017, we recorded 1081 functionally derelict areas in Slovenia in a total area of 3423 ha, with a prevalence of areas of industrial activities.

Keywords: functional derelict area (FDA), records, identification criteria, typology, monitoring, spatial planning, sustainable development

1 INTRODUCTION

The rapid spatial development dynamics is strongly affected by increasingly fast social and economic changes. On the one hand, we are faced with increasing requirements of investors for new areas to develop activities and, on the other hand, the increasing dynamics in suspending the already established activities, which leads to various types of degradation, particularly physical deterioration of space.

Derelict land, i.e. a brownfield site, is most commonly defined as any site that has been affected by its former use or human activities; it may be vacant or not fully
