Building a Campuswide Culture of Assessment: Including Nonacademic Departments in the Process

Janice A. Grackin

BUILDING A CAMPUSWIDE CULTURE OF ASSESSMENT IS A COMPLEX, LONG-TERM goal, and the process for achieving such a lofty goal must be thoughtfully planned, persistently and sensitively implemented, and, above all, inclusive of the various campus constituencies that form the backbone of our academic community. Often as campus assessment initiatives proceed, nonacademic departments and programs may be included only in support roles for academic departments or, worse, relegated to the observers' gallery with no active role whatsoever. This article describes the evolution of one collaboration, the Student Study Habits Project, which brought a nonacademic department—the Division of Campus Residences—into an active participatory role in growing the culture of assessment on the campus of a midsize, suburban public research university (Grackin, 2003).

The Student Study Habits Project

The Student Study Habits Project grew out of a chance meeting on the academic mall and a casual conversation between the director of the Division of Campus Residences and me. We discussed the division's plan to open tutoring centers in residence halls, and I observed that often such initiatives are undertaken with no assessment of their potential for success. Our long-standing and mutually respectful professional relationship—our social capital—provided the medium for a decision that we would initiate a study to assess the potential for success of the residence-based tutoring centers. Thus, the Student Study Habits Project was born. The project would also allow me to collect data to increase the strength of previous findings regarding validity and reliability of a measure for early identification of students potentially at academic risk.
