Protection of the Environment During Demolition Activities Frank W. Skinner, Louis Miller, W. Harvey, 1973 The objective of this study was to refine and/or develop new demolition techniques which would serve to minimize hazards to the environment in areas where demolition activities are scheduled or are on going. The objective of the first year's effort was to survey present demolition techniques and provide a vehicle for assuring that the most modern demolition techniques and procedures are described so that the Army might make use of them in developing demolition contracts. The phase of the study reported herein involved 1) determining the general state of the art of the demolition industry regarding techniques and current practices, 2) assessing Army demolition problems as characterized by typical projects, and 3) evolving basic guidelines and optional plans of action to be considered in planning demolition projects. It is concluded from this investigation that current Army policies concerning protection of the environment from demolition operations are in step with broad Federal policies aimed at improving the national level of environmental quality. Controlled Perimeter Blasting in Cold Regions
Malcolm Mellor, 1975 The general principles of pre-split blasting and smooth blasting are described and practical procedures that have been developed for work in common rocks are reviewed systematically. The topics covered include shothole spacing, charge weight per unit length of shothole, decoupling ratio, adjustments for explosive type and rock type, and weight of explosive per unit face area. Relevant properties of frozen rocks, frozen soils, and ice are compared with those of common unfrozen rocks, and appropriate adjustment of blast design is discussed. Interim relationships for the design of controlled perimeter blasting in frozen soils and massive ice are put forward, recognizing that additional experimentation is required.

Special problems in controlled blasting of ice are discussed These include effects of wet holes delayed removal of burden and submerged burden Special attention is given to the cutting of ice islands and icebergs An Appendix describes an operation in which the face of the ice wharf at McMurdo Sound was trimmed by pre split blasting Author Pits and Quarries ,1967
