The three rights separation reform (TRSR) has laid a concrete foundation institutionally to guide the well-ordered transfer of farmland and promoting the development of urbanization. With the new economics of labour migration (hereinafter referred to as the NELM) theory as the analytic basis, this empirical research investigates the potential ramifications of off-farm employment on land efficiency with household-based survey data from four provinces in China after TRSR. Unlike existing studies, we delve into how the effects are manifested differently among the types of off-farm employment by adopting an ordinary least squares (OLS) model and a two-stage least squares (2SLS) estimator. It provides evidence that migration positively affect land efficiency significantly, whereas a negative impact of local off-farm employment on land efficiency is observed, which distinct this study from previous findings. From the perspective of policy-making, land administrators should realize that off-farm employment differentiation is an important factor affecting land efficiency, and therefore needs to be fully considered in policy-making. Meanwhile, the establishment of local labor markets and favorable policies that stimulate productive technologies are needed.

1 Introduction

Accelerated urbanization and industrialization in countries around the world have triggered substantial changes in rural economy and structure (Rogg et al., 2014). Large numbers of rural laborers seek higher-return jobs and engage in off-farm employment while either transfer their farmland to others or simply abandon it, creating potential hazard to food security in China (Wang and Zhang, 2017). As such, the CPC Central Committee (the Communist Party of China) launched TRSR, the Three Rights Separation Reform, (separation of ownership, contracting and management right of agricultural land) in 2014. This policy divides the contracting rights of farmland into management rights and contracting rights, which profoundly changes the landscape of land transfer.
