

Mater Health takes hospital food to the next level with latest round of Luke Mangan inspired menus

Mater Health in Brisbane broke new ground in hospital food back in 2013 when it became the nation's first hospital to introduce the room service model with an à la carte menu. Twelve months ago, it built upon this innovation by partnering with well-known restaurateur and chef Luke Mangan to offer contemporary restaurant-style dishes. To find out more about this initiative we spoke to Mater Health Director Dietetics and Food Services Sally McCrory (pictured above with Aman Marwah and Luke) and Mater Dietetics Team Leader Laura Barsha.

"The project actually began at the end of 2019, but a little thing called Covid got in the way," Sally recalls. "In some ways it was a bit of a blessing because we had more time to refine the concept.

"Luke came in to the project with a focus on the health perspective – he has a great deal of experience in restaurants, not only in Australia but internationally"

Having introduced the room service model, we wanted to take our food to the next level and no one in Australia had partnered with a celebrity chef before, although there were some precedents in that Maggie Beer had done work in aged care and Jamie Oliver in schools. We reached out to Luke to sound out what we had in mind and after meeting to discuss our vision, he was keen to participate.

"Luke came in to the project with a focus on the health perspective – he has a great deal of experience in restaurants, not only in Australia but internationally. At that time he was also creating the food for Virgin Airlines business class and for the Asia Orient Express and had restaurants on P&O Cruise liners. He's worked
