

PHYSIOLOGY OF REPRODUCTION¹

BY J. E. MARKEE

*Department of Anatomy, Duke University School of Medicine,

Two topics in this review, histochemistry and neurohumoral relations in reproduction, have been emphasized. The other phases of the physiology of reproduction have been treated very briefly only because about 500 references must be mentioned in such a restricted space.

HISTOCHEMISTRY OF THE REPRODUCTIVE ORGANS

Hypophysis.—A study by electron microscopy of cytoplasmic granules in the anterior lobe cells of the rat hypophysis reveals no fundamental differences in the submicroscopic structure of the three basic cell types [Fernández-Morán & Luft (1)]. Normal development and cellular differentiation in the pituitary of the golden hamster conform to that in other mammals [Krol (2)]. Through the first 19 years of life, changes in the proportion of cell types in the human hypophysis do not indicate distinct histological cycles [Rasmussen (3)] that can be correlated with physiological ones.

The McManus-Hotchkiss periodic acid-leucofuchsin method of staining for polysaccharides or glycoproteins has stimulated considerable cytochemical work on the adenohypophysis (4 to 7). The basophil cells of the rat pituitary contain a glycoprotein constituent which increases greatly after castration and which fluctuates with the estrous cycle; a part of this material may be follicle stimulating hormone (FSH) [Catchpole (4)]. Other techniques [Wolfe (8)] supply cytochemical evidence of secretion of luteinizing hormone (LH) by acidophils and chromophobes in response to estrogen. Estrogen inhibits the hypophysis and induces a decrease in the relative numbers of both basophils and acidophils [Finerty & Meyer (9)]; this decrease occurs also during adolescence in the dog [Francis & Mulligan (10)]. The ascorbic acid level in the rat hypophysis increases with age (11) and adrenalectomy (12); pituitary stimulation of gonadotrophin-release in neither the rat nor the rabbit affected the normal level (11) as had been previously reported.

Changes in the human hypophysis during pregnancy include characteristic pregnancy cells, which are larger, but which apparently arise from chromophobe cells, and hypertrophied cell cords [Floderus (13)]. In the rat, mitotic activity in the hypophysis during the first three days of pregnancy and after parturition is related to the level of secretion produced by the pituitary or by the placenta [Hunt (14)].

The ovary.—The primary interstitial tissue of the ovary of the infantile
