

HISTORY OF ANTHROPOLOGY IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

INTRODUCTION

History of anthropology has a long-established history within the discipline. Virtually every major graduate program requires of its students a course in the history, sometimes combined with the theory, of anthropology. It is not obvious, however, that this has caused history of anthropology to fill a significant or integral role in the teaching and practice of the discipline. Indeed, the opposite has traditionally been true. The required course is frequently taught by the eldest member of the department, who is presumably qualified to teach the history because he has lived through more of it than anyone else. At best such a course provides the fledgling anthropologist with a collection of anecdotes, later to prove useful in socializing his own students within the profession. At worst such a course convinces the student that there is no intelligent reason to consider research done more than a decade previously.

All along, however, there have been a few anthropologists who have insisted that the history of the discipline is of relevance to its current practice. As a result of such convictions, coupled with the increasing interest of historians and historians of science in anthropology, the legitimacy of this subfield has been relatively clearly established. The starting point for what one might call the professionalization of history of anthropology is perhaps the 1962 conference sponsored by the Social Science Research Council. As Hymes (32) suggests, the importance of this conference is that it was held, the particular papers and topics being of less concern. It is notable primarily that most of the authors and participants were anthropologists, with a smattering of historians. Hymes (32) suggests further that a parable describes the ambiguous situation in which anthropological historians of their discipline found themselves at that time. Anthropologists, the members of a professional tribe, were simultaneously flattered by the attention of historians of science and disturbed by differences between their presumably objective accounts and the oral history of anthropology handed down by the elders of the discipline. The dilemma, and it is one which persists in the history of anthropology, is who shall write the history, anthropologists or historians?

looks at representations of American Indians in literature and film delineating a history of cultural propaganda that has served to support the continued colonization of Native America During each phase of the genocide of American Indians the media has played a critical role in creating easily digestible stereotypes of Indians for popular consumption Literature about Indians was first written and published in order to provoke and sanctify warfare against them Later the focus changed to enlisting public support for civilizing the savages stripping them of their culture and assimilating them into the dominant society Now in the final stages of cultural genocide it is the appropriation and stereotyping of Native culture that establishes control over knowledge and truth The primary means by which this is accomplished is through the powerful publishing and film industries Whether they are the tragically doomed noble savages walking into the sunset of Dances With Wolves or Carlos Castaneda's Don Juan the exotic mythical Indians constitute no threat to the established order Literature and art crafted by the dominant culture are an insidious political force disinforming people who might otherwise develop a clearer understanding of indigenous struggles for justice and freedom This book is offered to counter that deception and to move people to take action on issues confronting American Indians today
