

CADMIUM

Introduction

The major source of cadmium exposure is food. Smoking may contribute to approximately half of the total body burden when exposure via food is low. Within certain industries, occupational exposure is the dominating source of exposure.

Inhalation of cadmium dust or cadmium fumes may cause acute or chronic pulmonary disease; however, the risk for systemic effects as a result of long-term low-level exposure causes the greatest concern. This presentation is limited to cadmium in relation to systemic effects and does not cover carcinogenic effects.

Absorbed cadmium accumulates after long-term low-level exposure with a biological half-life of about 20 years. About one-third of the body burden will be in the kidneys and approximately one-half in the kidneys and liver together. After high exposure, relatively more cadmium will be found in the liver, where the biological half-life is shorter than in the kidney.

Systemic effects of cadmium may be seen in the kidneys, liver, hematopoietic system, and skeleton. The kidney is the critical organ, i.e. that organ which first attains its critical concentration of the metal. At this concentration, a small percentage of individuals show the first signs of effects. If kidney damage can be prevented, other systemic effects of cadmium will be prevented as well. Extensive reviews on metabolism and toxicity of cadmium are available, e.g. see (2, 4, 10, 11, 19, 23).

One method of biological monitoring is to look for early signs of effects in the critical organ; another is to monitor cadmium in indicator media, primarily blood and urine. The rationale of the first approach is to detect early signs of kidney dysfunction. Measurement of cadmium in indicator media is a means of monitoring accumulation of cadmium in the body to establish whether a toxic accumulation is occurring in the critical organ. It is doubtful whether, even at an early stage, kidney dysfunction in the form of proteinuria is reversible. The second monitoring approach is preferable,
