

and heat them with disintegrators and stoves, which were powered by water.

The other type of carriage factory was commonly organized laborers. In this case all of the work processes required to construct a carriage were performed.

With both types of factory came an increase in production in the post-Civil War era. But did we progress the traditional large shop from continuing to command a large share of the market, the considerable percentage of the market. The traditional method of production continued without the conventional system. This was, however, still based on the laborer's mode of production.

THE SHOP TRADITION

Before industrialization and the subsequent development of the factory, it was the carriage shop that dominated production. In the nineteenth century, carriage production took place in relatively small owner-operated shops. Production was carried out with the use of general-purpose machines and hand tools and power was supplied by animal, water or steam. The actual work involved in the production of a carriage was carried out by a master carriage maker, who was usually assisted by one or more apprentices.

These craftsmen were trained in the traditional apprentice system, in which young men were constructed to master processes for a number of years to learn a trade. In the carriage trade this education included learning such skills as blacksmithing, body-making, finishing, riveting, painting, stitching, stitching, trimming, varnishing and wheelwrighting. Although occasionally a carriage maker would depend upon a specially-trained artisan to carry out a particular work process, or may have had apprentices or journeymen with specialized skills working for him, for the most part a carriage maker was adept at all of the skills needed to build a carriage.

In the nineteenth century progressed, an increase in demand for horse-drawn vehicles stimulated production and created a need for a level of production that was unsustainable in the small owner-operated shop. The factory and the factory system of production were able to meet the increased demand and thus came to dominate manufacturing.

THE CARRIAGE FACTORY AND THE FACTORY SYSTEM OF PRODUCTION

The production of carriages in a late nineteenth-century carriage factory was a much more capital-intensive endeavor than the practice of traditional carriage making had been. To a large extent, much of the high cost of production was due to the added overhead of machinery. The most basic as well as the most successful of machines was a power plant that could supply a safe, reliable and centralized source of power.

Although in the past power had been supplied by animals or water, the factory was neither reliable nor convenient and the latter required housing factories at particular and perhaps inconvenient sites. By the 1870s the steam engine was generally adopted by the carriage industry. Its popularity was such that in 1890 the J. H. Cannon of Manchester reported it to be the most reliable and power source in the United States. However, by the turn of the century, no superiority was needed by steam-powered carriages. One of the advantages of electric power was that it created less vibration and noise and was more easily managed, safer and more reliable than steam engines.

Given a source of energy became available, machinery could be used to assist more of the work processes. This is evidenced by the relatively early use widespread appearance of machinery in the factory. While in 1820 the average carriage shop was equipped with only lathe, lugs and the hand tools of the blacksmith and wheelwright, a late nineteenth-century carriage factory included a much more extensive array of equipment. The inventory of one such factory in 1870 included fifteen circular saws, two wood lathes, six iron lathes, six turning and boring machines, three planers, one lathe, six planing machines, six log lathes, two spring machines and four drills, all powered by a steam engine.
