The 19th Hong Kong International Film Festival

Sam Rohdie

The 19th Hong Kong International Film Festival took place this year between 7-22 April. Just under 150 films from various countries were screened. The Festival grouped films under different headings: Hong Kong films of 1994-1995; China and Hong Kong films from the 1930s through the 1950s; Documentaries; first films of new directors; International films; Asian films; Tributes to Ken Loach and to the Sri Lankan filmmakers, James and Sumitra Peries; films to celebrate the centenary of the cinema; documentaries, a fiction film, two classics (John Ford's Straight Shooting [1917] and Abel Gance's Mater Dolorosa [1917]); films related to Hong Kong and China from 1898 through to the early 1930s.

The films in the China and Hong Kong retrospective, save three, were not subtitled in English, nor did they have a simultaneous translation. They were available only to those with Mandarin and Cantonese. There were a few discussions with Chinese filmmakers, but in Mandarin and Cantonese and not translated. The Festival did not organise social or intellectual events or venues to encourage exchanges with filmmakers and others. There was no context created for films outside of the screenings.

The films made in China were unmarked by country of origin. The fact of it was muted. Last year there had been protests from China at the screening of some Chinese films in the Festival to which the Chinese government took exception. There were attempts by the Chinese to have the films withdrawn. Some filmmakers were directly intimidated.

Zhang Yuan, whose film The Square was screened at the Festival this year, has had his new project, Chicken Feathers, taken from him. Film studios, processing houses, film equipment companies have been forbidden by the authorities to work with him. Effectively, he has been prohibited from making films. He can speak out but without echo or reverberation for comfort. Though the Chinese film industry is being commercialised and will not benefit from State subsidies, official censorship continues, based on an inclusive, and arbitrary, notion of the ideological. I saw about one-third of the films in the Festival. I primarily watched Asian and Chinese/Hong Kong films, but saw some others: Jean-Luc Godard, Abbas Kiarostami, Nanni Moretti, Alain Resnais, Eric Rohmer, Agnes Varda, regrettably, not Joris Ivens' 1938 documentary on China's resistance to the Japanese, The Four Hundred Million. I did not see the Loach and the Peries films. I thought the two Abbas Kiarostami films (And Life Goes on... [1992] and Through the Olive Trees [1994]) the two most interesting and beautiful films of the Festival.

The Hong Kong Film Archive has been buying prints of films either made in or about Hong Kong and China. It is having some of these restored and restruck. Some were in a programme, "Chinese Images in a Western Mirror". It included Edison footage from 1898 shot in Shanghai, Macao and Guangzhou, and a remarkable film, Voyage to Peking, made in 1909, produced by a French banker, Albert Kahn, and photographed by his chauffeur, Alfred Duterte. Duterte's diary of the trip to China is the commentary of the
