Mobilization, Factionalization and Destruction of Mass Movements in the Cultural Revolution Joshua Zhang, Philip Monte, James Wright, 2020-06-05 Based on a unique survey of Chinese respondents the authors find that participation in social movements during the Cultural Revolution was motivated by the desire to improve social status or maintain existing positions in the social hierarchy A strong relationship is noted between factional alignment and family background in provinces immersed in class based struggle however the association becomes nil in provinces where sectarian struggle was grounded in class The authors assert that the social conflict school has failed to adequately examine sectarian internecine fights among rebels in attempts to explain the mass movements while the political process school has ignored fundamental social conflicts embedded in Chinese society Potential pitfalls likely to confront future mass movements are identified
