

"I loved the dark, closing dark of my tent, the cozy familiarity of the way I arranged my few belongings all around me each night."

— Cheryl Strayed, Wild: From Lost to Found on the Pacific Crest Trail

Cold Camping Shelters

HASTING OUT FOR A DAY OF SKIING or snowshoeing in the frozen woods is one thing. Sleeping over in it is another. It's what usually stops many outdoor types from trying winter camping. They wonder about keeping warm through the long, dark chilly hours and would rather go home to a mug of hot chocolate in front of a roaring fire (or television set).

There's an enormous list of shelters to sleep in, from snow caves to heated canvas tents. All have their place. It depends on where you're going, weather conditions, snow conditions, how long you're going for, how much weight you are willing to carry, and how much money you have.

Tents

To "cold camp" means to sleep in a tent without a heat source. This isn't a regular summer tent, however. It should be a four-season model. What makes a four-season structure is a sturdy pole system and tough fabric that can withstand snow loads and heavy winds. Choose a tent with lots of little extras, such as side pockets and a ceiling hammock for gear storage, a center hook to dangle your flashlight or candle lantern from, color-coded clips and poles for easier setup, secondary guy lines for tightening the tent down in harsh conditions, and a light-colored fabric that allows in more light and brightness upon waking after a long cold night.
