being the deepest part and he should feel his seat bones like two little slides. The upper body should be upright with the back in a natural position—that is, slightly arched, definitely not collapsed in the middle, or stiff or rigid. The term 'bowed back' is usually misunderstood and the result is a hollow stiff back. The rider's back is very important in respect of maintaining balance and being able to co-ordinate leg and hand aids. The head must be up with a long neck above square shoulders. The rider should look to the front and in the direction of the movement. He should give the impression that he is observing himself in a mirror from a distance. The shoulders should be back and dropped down. If they are dropped forward, the back will tend to become round making it very difficult for him to keep his balance. The tendency usually is to lift the shoulders and therefore stiffen the arms. The arm should hang loosely from the shoulder with the elbow in the vicinity of the hip. The elbow is bent, allowing a straight line to form from the elbow, through
