Courtship Of Sea Creatures:

The Courtship of Sea Creatures Jean-Pierre Otte, 2001 After observing the sexual strategies of garden flowers and insects in Love in the Garden Jean Pierre Otte turns his attention to the intimate lives of the creatures he finds at the seashore He arrives at the shore with a heightened awareness of every dank odor the rustle of water and the changing light of the vast sky Thrusting his hands into a transparent tidal pool he is off on another round of observations His interest is very precise the sexuality of sea creatures from crabs to shrimp and even seaweed His viewpoint is ironic witty poetic and wise He finds sea urchins in congregations of indifferent promiscuity He describes the melancholy of lobsters who must mate in armor We find ourselves inside a mussel's shell as it dreams in the heart of a wet and oblong darkness On oysters he begins Any experience with the sea is useless if it does not miraculously take us back to the universe of women who preserve the great original rhythms the oceanic and lunar cycles We are even led to imagine the modest voluptuousness felt by seaweed in the simple pleasure of being alive in motion and joyful In observing the abundant primitive forms of life around him he says When filled with wonder one always opens up again to the universe and at the same time to one's universe In a final scene on the beach he shares an intense sexually charged moment with a woman as they open and ingest some of these creatures which have been the object of his scrutiny the subject of his musings and the inspiration of his layered poetic language We are brought face to face with the universal desire for connection in the ironic ending to a book full of wisdom and hope
