Frailty in primary care: challenges, innovations, and future directions

Kristiana Ludlow^{1*}, Oliver Todd², Natasha Reid³ and Hakan Yaman³

Abstract

Frailty is one of the biggest challenges to healthy ageing, and yet our understanding and management of frailty is in its infancy. In this editorial we outline challenges, innovations and future directions in frailty research in primary care, and invite contributions to BMC Primary Care's "Frailty in Primary Care" Collection.

Keywords Frailty, Primary Care, Older adults

Main body

In an ageing society, understanding how to maintain good health in old age presents one of the defining challenges of our times. The negative consequences of ageing have been characterised as frailty; however, frailty is not inevitable, and there has been a growing body of research over the past 20 years demonstrating new insights into frailty prevention and management to improve the health of older adults. BMC Primary Care welcomes submissions to its new "Frailty in Primary Care" Collection to help further our understanding of identifying, measuring, preventing and managing frailty, and supporting those who are living with frailty.

Frailty refers to a loss of physiological reserve and a failure of homeostasis to maintain a steady state in the face of stressors (e.g., an infection, fall, new medication or environmental change). These stressors can cause dramatic changes in the person—from being lucid to delirious, mobile to being bedbound, independent to requiring care for basic daily needs [1].

Frailty operates on a spectrum and is characterised by an increased risk of poor outcomes, including longer and more frequent hospitalisations, more peri-operative complications, greater functional needs, long-term disability, and mortality [2]. Prevalence estimates of frailty in older community-dwelling adults range from 4 to 59%, with an overall weighted average frailty prevalence of 10.7% and a pre-frailty prevalence of 41.6% [3]. Groups disproportionately affected by frailty include women [3], people living with socioeconomic deprivation [3], those living in long-term care facilities [4], and people living with severe mental illness [5].

Primary care providers are in a unique position to identify and manage frailty as they can intervene early in a patient's frailty trajectory. They may have the opportunity to develop ongoing relationships with patients over time, affording them a more comprehensive understanding of patients' health status, medical history, and social circumstances. As such, primary care providers can develop individualised care plans to address physical activity, social and emotional needs, nutritional status, and optimisation of medication.

We are in the infancy of understanding and measuring frailty. We know that over time, humans accumulate damage at a cellular and molecular level. These changes include genomic instability, telomere attrition, epigenetic alterations, mitochondrial dysfunction, and cellular senescence [6]. The onset and rate of damage, and the
