Introduction to Literary Criticism

Definition: Literary criticism is the study, evaluation, and interpretation of literature.

Why practise criticism at all? Because it's interesting, and opens the door to a wider appreciation of literature, particularly that in other languages.

There are different approaches for the practice for literary criticism. Here we have a summary of the main ones. We are not going to chose one of them, but we are going to use them all to some extent.

Approach	Literature is	its purpose	methodology	implications
Formalism New Criticism	autonomous object; unified in terms of form and meaning; features irony, paradox, and complexity has a single valid interpretation	aesthetic appreciation of verbal art and technique. Literature valued as a high art whose meaning can transcend time.	focus on structure and elements of the work, especially how form and meaning are related. Establish unity of the work through interrelation of all its parts.	revolutionized the study of literature; helped create literature as a serious object of inquiry; became official way to teach literature--anyone could learn to do a formalist explication--didn't need to research social, biographical, and historical contexts.
Genre Studies	organized by categories and derives meaning through its relationship to other works with similar characteristics. It is based on generic expectations	Purpose and value depends on the genre. For Aristotle, the purpose of tragedy was catharsis, the purging of the emotions of fear and pity.	Identify characteristics of different genres of literature and categorize individual works.	Literary work can't be read out of the context of other works similar to it. Authors write within certain traditions and conventions, even if they break with them.
Rhetorical	a means to an end, an instrument for getting something done; features strategies and techniques designed to govern the reader's response	moral instruction, inform and persuade the reader;	Consider author's purpose and intention, how they want the audience to act.	literature is rhetorical since it is always about ideas, and often touches on ultimate questions about the nature of humankind etc. Author always writes to an audience and the author's conception of the audience alters the work of art.
Reader-Response	is an experience; text is not separate from its realization by a	to alter reader's assumptions and characteristic ways of viewing	Study the complex process of a reader constructing meaning from the	Reader is really an ideal or implied reader and often is fantastically
