Storyline Concerns and Word Order Typology in East and West Africa Robert E. Longacre,1990 This volume considers data from some forty African languages on the East and West sides of the continent in an effort to answer the question How do languages of different word order typologies tell a story The evidence suggests that the ordering of constituents on the clause level i e subject verb and object complement often determines differences in the mechanics of story telling Furthermore in some perhaps all languages storyline clauses are the most typical and diagnostic of the word order typology itself perhaps because the story anecdote is the most basic form of monologue discourse P 1

Generative Linguistics Frederick J. Newmeyer,1996 Here together for the first time are all of Frederick J Newmeyer s writings on the origin and development of generative grammar Spanning a period of fifteen years the essays address the nature of the Chomskyan Revolution the deep structure debates of the 1970s and the attempts to apply generative theory to second language acquisition These articles many of which have never been published before will inevitably fan the flames of controversy still raging in this field Newmeyer s audacious conclusions and his argument that generative semantics collapsed because it was empirically disproved challenge much current thinking

Written by one of America's most prominent linguists the essays in Generative Linguistics provide a challenging re appraisal of the Chomskyan Revolution the implications of which are still being debated some thirty years further on Generative Grammar and Linguistic Competence Peter H. Matthews, 1979
