

over his eyes, and the eyes themselves were unpleasant. There must have been something left in the bottle whose nose had protruded from the bag.

He dropped into a chair and dragged it screamingly after him along the kitchen floor till he was within a yard of the table. Then he recognized the others.

"Ye're here," he observed. "Whit was a' your hurry? Gie's a cup o' tea. I'm no wantin' no meat."

He was obviously rather drunk. Jalkie handed him a cup of tea, which, having dropped in four lumps of sugar, he drank noisily from the saucer. It steadied him, and he spread a some thick with butter and jelly and began to eat it. Mr. Crow regarded him with extreme distaste and a little nervousness.

"Whit about the Solomon terrier?" he asked. "For two quid he's yours."

The question was addressed to Mr. Crow, who answered coldly that he was not buying dogs.

"Ay, but ye'll buy this dog."

"Where is it?" Jalkie asked.

"In the stable wi' the filly yin. Tied down like the wee dog, so I've tied them up in separate stalls, or he'd hae it thowed up."

The rest of the meal was given up to efforts on the part of the drover to effect a sale. His price came down to fifteen shillings and a glass of whisky. Questioned by Jalkie as to its pedigree, he embarked on a rambling tale, patently a lie, of a friend who bred Solomons and had presented him with this specimen in payment of a bet. Talk made the drover thirsty. He refused a second cup of tea and departed for the house, and when Mrs. Johnston appeared he ordered a bottle of Bass.

Jalkie, remembering the plans for the morrow, asked if there was such a thing as a bicycle about the place, and was told that her man possessed one. She saw no objection to his borrowing it for half a day. Jalkie had found favour in her eyes.

The drover drank his beer noisily and called for another bottle. Mrs. Johnston glanced anxiously at Jalkie as she fulfilled the order, but Jalkie gave no sign. Now beer on the top of whisky is bad for the constitution, especially if little food has accompanied it, and soon the drover began to show that his case was no exception. His silence gave place to a violent garrulity. Throwing his face close to the startled Mr. Crow, he announced that that gentleman was greatly well going to buy the Solomon—that he had accepted the offer, and that he would be magnanimously glad to see the immediate release of his money.

Mr. Crow withdrew his chair, and the other hunched to his feet and came after him. The profanity of the drover, delivered in a hoarse roar, brought Mrs. Johnston back in alarm. The seller's tone was far from clear, but it seemed to be his argument that Mr. Crow had taken delivery of a pup and was refusing payment. He was working himself into a fury at what he declared to be a case of strongly qualified talk.
