Biorhythms and Industrial Safety

INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT PREVENTION

With over four million industrial accidents recorded in 1975 alone, and one out of every ten workers afflicted with a job-related disease or injury,<sup>1</sup> it is evident why safety is one of industry's highest priorities. In 1970 the government established the comprehensive safety regulations, the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA), the purpose of which was to raise the safety standards of the American industrial working environment. Even with this regulation industry safety records have not improved, and the majority of industrial accidents are attributed to individual worker performance. Traditional methods to reduce human errors have relied on educational programs, safety slogans, posters and verbal communications. This traditional approach assumes a constant level of human performance. Safety engineers usually do not take into account that human performance is a variable which is often not a function of the working environment. If emphasis can be placed on safety during low periods of human performance, this emphasis could make some contribution to accident prevention. The science of "biorhythms" is the science of predicting human performance by means of understanding biological rhythms. By utilizing this new science, it is estimated that as many as two million on-the-job accidents might potentially be prevented each year.
