Biological Deterioration of Woods in Tropical Environments Charles R. Southwell, John Dale Bultman, 1971 Six chemical wood preservatives were selected for evaluation over long periods of exposure in extremely borer active marine environments Southern Yellow Pine and Douglas Fir were full cell pressure treated with these chemicals and exposed in tropical seas and tropical brackish water for periods up to 90 months Subsequently 16 of the natural tropical woods considered best for use with pressure preservatives were combined with whole creosote and exposed in the most borer active of the seawater sites for periods exceeding 4 years All samples have been removed sectioned and rated separately for the three major groups of marine borers teredo pholad and limnoria The long term results show that heavy treatments of whole creosote and chromated copper arsenate CCA type A are very effective preservatives for Southern Pine exposed in seawater while the CCA was the singularly most effective treatment against the brackish water Psiloteredo Some of the most promising results were obtained with combinations of a few relatively limnoria resistant tropical woods with a teredo effective creosote pressure treatment Author
