Birds In Literature:

Birds in Literature Leonard Lutwack, 1994 Although they are as commonplace as our backyards birds remain wild unpossessed by humans living beside us but alone as Matthew Arnold observes and as Leonard Lutwack explores in this study of the depiction of birds in literature The very attributes that make birds so familiar their flight and song retain an air of mystery that sets them apart from other animals They appear to exist effortlessly in a state of mixed animal and spiritual being that humans long to attain This simultaneous familiarity and transcendence gives birds a wide range of meaning in the works that Lutwack describes His examples both expected and surprising come in some measure from Greco Roman writers but primarily from the poetry and prose of American and British writers of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries Lutwack divides his material into five sections birds in poetry and as metaphor including the classical nightingale and the swan and the birds of such poets as Dickinson Whitman and Stevens birds and the supernatural including ancient beliefs in birds as images and disguised gods as well as some interesting modern revivals of bird gods the quetzal in Lawrence the crow in Ted Hughes and the hawk in Jeffers birds that are trapped hunted or killed in sacrifice such as Coleridge's albatross Ibsen's wild duck Chekhov's seagull Kosinski's painted bird birds and the erotic with special emphasis on Lawrence's juxtaposition of birds and lovers the association of white birds with chastity and the traditional identification of women with docile birds and men with raptors and a section on literature and the future of birds that includes strategies for dealing with the increasing threat to real birds posed by humans Literature has made and must continue to make the reading public sensitive to nature Lutwack writes and literary birds may prove to be our best link to it
