Gender, Ethnicity and Space Elizabeth Ann Lorenz-Meyer, 2006 In the first half of the 20th century how does one become American was a question of great public concern debated by native born Americans and recent immigrants alike Scholars have seized on this question to explore from many vantage points the issues of acculturation assimilation and identity in a multicultural and multiracial society The history of the immigrant experience and civic identity formation has taken on greater urgency in the twenty first century as another major wave of immigrants raises the question once again Through an examination of the St Paul and Minneapolis Jewish immigrant communities this dissertation explores the ways in which early twentieth century contestations over gender and ethnic identity were reflected in the spaces immigrants experienced and shaped Much of the literature on the history of immigration to the United States includes a discussion of Americanization Problematically this paradigm of Americanization ignores the experiences of the immigrants themselves Another problem with the classic Americanization paradigm is that it often assumes a neutral norm and the hegemony of a cultural system In contrast to other immigrants who most often encountered native born Anglos in their Americanization experiences native born German Jews were the reformers who assisted East European Jewish immigrants in the Twin Cities As such the Jewish immigrant experience emerged differently and in fact challenges the assumption that there was one American culture against which immigrants struggled In looking at Jewish immigrants use of settlement houses workplaces and religious and social institutions my dissertation suggests the need for a broader interpretation of the history of Americanization I argue that rather than accept wholeheartedly a native born notion of proper American behavior Jewish immigrant men and women and their children fashioned their own sense of what it meant to be an American man or woman The decisions they made often resulted in significant conflicts with native born German Jews and within immigrant families By offering a way of understanding the forging of American-ness and the simultaneous forging of manhood womanhood my dissertation demonstrates the interrelatedness of ethnic and gender construction Abstract
