Battles of English History (Classic Reprint) Hereford B. George, 2018-02 Excerpt from Battles of English History. Battles are the most generally interesting class of events in history and not without reason. Until mankind have all been reduced to a single pattern which would put an end to history, there will be conflicting interests, sentiments, creeds, principles which will from time to time lead to war. We may settle many disputes peacefully by mutual concession or by voluntary submission to external arbitration, but an appeal to arms always lies behind and is the only resource when differences go too deep for reconciliation or when the self-respect of nations is too severely wounded. Even within a nation there are many possibilities, remote perhaps yet never unimaginable, which may bring about civil war. And though it is perfectly conceivable that a given war may be waged to the end without a single important battle, if the superior skill of one side enables it to gain overwhelming advantage without fighting, yet practically this does not happen. Battles are in fact the decisive events in the contests which are of sufficient moment to grow into war. It is very easy to exaggerate their importance, to fix attention on the climax only and lose sight of the events which led up to it and which went very far in most cases towards determining its result. But after all, the battle is the climax and the world in general may be forgiven for overestimating it.
