Bénédicte Ledent

In 1983, Salman Rushdie observed (in an essay on 'Commonwealth Literature') that black British literature does not exist, that "the category is a chimera" comprising different traditions united only by their proponents' pigmentation alongside their British citizenship or residence. The label 'black British' has often been seen as reductive and divisive, notably by literary practitioners; yet it has had wide currency since the 1980s. Writers cast as 'black British' frequently object that, despite the challenge implied in combining these two adjectives, the phrase suggests a marginalization in its relation to what might be called 'white British literature' – a much less common tag. Some resent being seen as an appendage to mainstream literature, or complain, like Fred D'Aguiar in a 1986 piece entitled "Against Black British Literature", that the assumptions of authenticity underlying the label confine their creative imagination which should "[know] no boundaries". These questions are far-reaching. Other European nations, with imperial histories of their own, are confronted with comparable issues. But the complexities of colonial and postcolonial history have given them particular resonance in relation to our understanding of British literature.

When the term 'black British literature' became current in the 1970s, it was designed to describe writing by authors based in Britain but with origins in former British colonies in Asia, Africa, and the Caribbean. It was at that time a political rather than a purely racial label, pointing to a common experience of postcolonial migration, alienation, and discrimination, combined with an oblique yet potentially subversive assertion of attachment to Britain. This explains why writers of Asian origin such as Rushdie and Hanif Kureishi, both of Indian heritage, or even Kazuo Ishiguro with roots in Japan, were in the 1980s and 1990s unproblematically included in a wide-ranging category which also involved artists more obviously 'black' like Ben Okri, born in Nigeria, or Linton Kwesi Johnson, born in Jamaica. However, the term has lost some of its early scope, and now conventionally refers to authors of African and Caribbean descent. Writers with Asian roots are today often subsumed under the 'British Asian or Asian British' banner, which is the case for a younger writer like Monica Ali, whose best-selling debut novel Brick Lane (2003) is set in London's Bangladeshi community. This does not mean that the ethnic delineations of 'black British' writing have

Black British Literature:

Black British Literature Mark Stein, 2004 In this fascinating book Mark Stein examines black British literature centering on a body of work created by British based writers with African South Asian or Caribbean cultural backgrounds Linking black British literature to the bildungsroman genre this study examines the transformative potential inscribed in and induced by a heterogeneous body of texts Capitalizing on their plural cultural attachments these texts portray and purvey the transformation of post imperial Britain Stein locates his wide ranging analysis in both a historical and a literary context He argues that a cross cultural and interdisciplinary approach is essential to understanding post colonial culture and society The book relates black British literature to ongoing debates about cultural diversity and thereby offers a way of reading a highly popular but as yet relatively uncharted field of cultural production With the collapse of its empire with large scale immigration from former colonies and with ever increasing cultural diversity Britain underwent a fundamental makeover in the second half of the twentieth century This volume cogently argues that black British literature is not only a commentator on and a reflector of this makeover but that it is simultaneously an agent that is integral to the processes of cultural and social change Conceptualizing the novel of transformation this comprehensive study of British black literature provides a compelling analytic framework for charting these processes Black British Literature Prabhu S.
