

Indoor-grown Titan Peruvian will happily accept a day or two outdoors occasionally.

DRAINAGE

Containers with side slits for drainage around the base do not need crocking or other added drainage material. Types with a large centre hole can have the usual pile of soil reducing base crocks replaced with a square of fibreglass insect gauze over the base, with a small handful of lightly crushed charcoal, gravel or similar coarse material over this.

Add sufficient potting soil to bring the soil level of the plant to within 2 or 3 cm of the pot rim. Then with the potting soil only slightly damp so that it runs freely, pour it in several stages between soil ball and walls of new pot, packing it in at the same time with a piece of dowelling or similar aid. Also give the container a slight tamping to settle the plant in. This is done by lifting it fractionally and dropping it several times on a firm surface — if the pot is a breakable type first insulate with cardboard or similar material.

When the soil level is readjusted (without completely covering the old soil ball), give a good soaking by standing the container in water to about two-thirds height of the soil ball.

Do not feed after repotting for at least six weeks. This encourages roots to venture out into the new soil.

Some people prefer to first tease some of the roots out if the plant is in a rootbound condition or even to shave off the outer woody mass in alternate strips. This does help the plant to recover better ultimately but it needs a good humid surrounding such as one of those 'holiday care' plastic plant tents for at least a few weeks while roots are recovering.

Orchids. For LACs, use a mixture of 1 part of finely chopped tree fern bark to 1 part of peat moss. If you prefer to make your own potting soil a good mixture is the John Innes Potting Compost which consists of:

- 7 parts good crumbly and previously composted garden loam
- 3 parts matted peatmoss
- 2 parts coarse river sand to every 5 litres of mixture add about a level teaspoon of garden lime or dolomite and either about a tablespoon of dry powdered bone manure or 2 teaspoons of bone dust. Note that the plant food additions are not exactly the same as specified for the English mix but the closest substitute from ingredients generally available in other areas.

There are many potting mixtures with quite different components that all give good results. The main aim is for a mixture that remains crumbly, allows air and water to enter readily and excess to drain away freely but holds reasonable amounts of moisture. It also needs to give the roots good anchorage.

'Gold Dust' Fern (Pteris hybrid) displays gold-dusted new fronds.
