

Mind Over Matter, Matter Over Mind?

Simon Sommerhuber, Henriette Löffler-Stastka
 Medical University Vienna, Austria

Abstract – Objectives: To study the extent of psychosomatic education in an integrated medical curriculum.

Methods: Systematic hot spot examination in 2014/2015 of lectures and curriculum elements of all six academic years.

Results: 4% of the lecture material mention contents meeting the criteria.

Discussion: Due to the lack of comparable studies the comparison with other curricula is not possible. The utilization of psychosomatic medicine as a therapeutic tool appears underestimated.

Keywords – Medical Education, Psychosomatic Medicine.

I. INTRODUCTION

If a patient happens to be so unkind to present with unrecognizable symptoms, and refuses to get better with our treatment regime, the answer - after a certain number of frustrating attempts - is clear: it has to be psychosomatic. Maybe our patient even shows signs of an unspecified mood disorder, not unsurprisingly after a long road of diagnostic procedures with negative findings and untreated disorders. So we fill out a referral slip for a psychiatric examination, and a psychiatrist happily examines our patient - by looking at his lab results, knowing that an assortment of illnesses, endocrinological shifts, etc... can cause psychiatric disorders and should be ruled out. The diagnostic road of our patient is prolonged, but could there be a shortcut with the right psychosomatic training.

No physician in modern medicine is able to know everything, but does he even have the chance to? The interaction between body and mind is not an easy topic since it is more ambiguous than cold, hard lab results. It is the impression of the authors that most of the classic psychosomatic contents are taught in the lectures on psychic functions in health and disease, but how does the rest of the curriculum do? In the very first week students hear a lecture specifically about psychosomatic medicine, to show them that there is more than just external factors interacting with the body. It is our opinion that body and mind should not be taught as two single entities affecting each other on certain occasions, but as one unit, where the changing of one cogwheel alters the whole system. We have the luxury of knowing some of the interactions between these two entities, with enough unknown factors, e.g. the role of the gut microbiome, still to be discovered and explored [1]. According to our point of view the process of a psychosomatic diagnosis should never be via exclusion - an approach that is common, expensive, and frustrating for both the physician and the patient. In our understanding the hypothesis "psychosomatic genesis" should run along side the whole diagnostic process, with the worst-case-scenario of this being that we ask ourselves what the mental state of our patient might be, and if this might affect his or her somatic well-being. This being in line with Uexküll [2], who despised the term and the dichotomy it leads to, preferring to use the phrase he coined - "integrated medicine".

II. AIMS

This study aims to explore the way psychosomatic medicine is included in the medical curriculum, with psychosomatic medicine defined as the understanding of the way the mind affects somatic functions and vice versa and/or the mind can cause somatic symptoms, and the body psychic symptoms. Particularly the difference between the beginning of the curriculum and the end is of interest. As these lectures become progressively clinical, is the relationship between body and mind still an aspect?

III. METHODOLOGY

During the period of the academic term of fall/winter and spring/summer of 2014/15 the available lectures of all six academic years were examined due to any mentioning of the relationship between body and mind and categorized according to

- the segment in which students came in contact with the subject.
- if the lectures explicitly had psychosomatic medicine as their subject or if it was just part of one
- if psychosomatic medicine was offered as a way of understanding the pathogenesis of disease or as a diagnostic process
- if psychosomatic medicine was offered and presented from its therapeutic/treatment models as well
- if psychosomatic processes were described as the mind influencing the body or vice versa

IV. LIMITATIONS OF THIS METHODOLOGY

To what extent lecturers presented psychosomatic links to further literature or to electives was not determinable by reading the presentations. Also the required reading list was not examined by the authors.

V. RESULTS

The whole study of medicine contains 259.5 semester-hours, plus 15 hours of elective courses and 12 weeks of required extracurricular internship. Out of these, 152 academic hours of lectures or seminars, therefore 10.1 semester-hours or roughly 4%, contained at least a mentioning of contents of the defined criteria. The more specific results are presented chronologically referring to
