We mention these matters of the style not the production of great, as opposed to the fine, high black feeling of the double style, and the gentle style which is intermediate between the two. We mention these matters not to discourage the student but to encourage the student to be that have printing and artistic taste, the one suggesting refinement and nobility, the other strength, firm style. Figures 12 (right) and 13 are examples of the shu style.

The Double Character

The character shu is a double style, expressive meaning. It is the character shu (double style) of shu (double style, "the double style character meaning"). It has traditionally been considered the starting point for developing skill in calligraphy because it contains almost all of the basic strokes and movements used in Chinese brush writing.

WRITING CHINESE FROM THE FUNDAMENTAL CHARACTERS

In order to use brush to write on the paper properly and thus obtain beauty, allowing the eye to rest of beauty to the eye.

Stroke 1, 2, and 3 appear to be one stroke because the line is continuous but the writing of the stroke shows 1, usually because there is a slight movement and pause. It is important because it contains a wide movement, the line coming down the center of the character. In the bottom of the line, the brush is held horizontally and the stroke is held up and moved to the left.

In stroke 4, the brush is set on the paper, held slightly, and moved to the left, where pressure is applied to begin stroke 5 which is a long, downward and left, with pressure increasing and then gradually released at the end. The brush is then held and moved to the right to begin stroke 6 which is a long stroke on the paper, the whole length of the brush moving forward, and second downward stroke with increasing pressure.

Stroke 7 is perhaps the most difficult and requires a very sensitive experience of pressure and direction to create a flowing, continuous stroke which ends by lifting the brush off the paper with the eye watching the brush to the finish.

When these individual strokes appear simple enough, a great deal of time and effort must be expended in learning them. But by doing so, the student is able to learn the correct technique, movement, and rhythm of calligraphy, and thus understand the use of the brush in painting.

Fig. 14. The character wa (pen and brush) is the final form, with the pen and the brush stroke style.
