

Early Childhood Education in India: History, Trends, Issues, and Achievements¹

Jyotsna Pattnaik^{2,3}

The changes in the social and economic structure of India have intensified the need for universal early childhood education. The formidable challenges before the Indian Government are: to provide high quality early childhood education programs; to preserve indigenous practices such as multilinguality, family/community involvement, participation of older children as caretakers of their younger siblings; and to provide early childhood education to all children despite serious financial constraints. This article presents a brief overview of the traditional childrearing practices in India, chronicles government initiatives in early childhood education, describes the range of programs available in India, and identifies goals that will shape the future of early childhood programs in India.

KEY WORDS: childrearing practices; early childhood programs; teacher training; international early childhood education.

THE VIEW OF THE CHILD IN INDIAN SOCIETY

In India, childhood is considered to be a unique and enjoyable period in an individual's life, so children are pampered by the adults in the family and in the community. Numerous special occasions in the community mark the significance of this developmental period. For example, the whole community celebrates the birth of a child, a child's first intake of solid food, the naming ceremony for a child, and the child's first day of formal education. Informal learning of young children in a natural environment through songs, dance, play, and talk are a regular component of the childrearing responsibilities of adults and older children in India. However, the growing demands of a newly industrialized nation have altered many of the basic childrearing practices in India. The need for more structured early childhood education programs and stronger governmental involvement in the education of young children is rapidly emerging.

HISTORY OF EARLY CHILDHOOD EDUCATION IN INDIA

Universal early childhood education in India is a relatively recent development. Throughout the history of India, formal education was limited to only male members of the high caste groups. Mass illiteracy among children of low caste families and female children has had a cumulative effect of unequal distribution of educational opportunities among the population. The conscious and systematic attempt to educate children from all sections of the society began in 1937 with the educational philosophy of Gandhi. Gandhi's basic education scheme was designed to set up free and compulsory education at the national level. Maria Montessori's 1939 visit to India implanted the foundations of preschool education in India and teachers were trained in Montessori's method of education. Her major books were translated into many Indian languages. Today, there are many Montessori preschools in India, and
